Legalizing gay marriage will lead to it being taught as normative in elementary schools, according to new TV ads in three states where the issue is on the ballot.

The 30-second advertisements in Maine, Maryland and Minnesota all feature a couple, David and Tonia Parker, who live in Massachusetts, where gay marriage is legal.

"After Massachusetts redefined marriage, local schools taught it to children in second grade, including the school our son attended," David Parker says to the camera. "Courts ruled parents have no right to take their children out of class -- or to even be informed when this instruction was going to take place." ...

I thought I will send my daughter to school till certain age so that she will develop social behavior. Seeing these thrones that US schools are sowing into these young hearts, I will not even send her for preschool. Home school or denounce US citizenship are the two options.

My twelve year old Nephew was telling me the other day that he hopes Obama gets in, and I asked him why. And he said that he believe in equality for all and that includes gays. I listened to his reasonings and then let it go. But then he brought it up again and I had to say something and told him about what God thought about it. There was silence in the car and I have no idea how that sank in, but I can only imagine what is being taught to these kids. I saw my other Nephews school teacher the other, a man who is totally effeminate. Some men may be this way naturally but it's hard to tell what is being address to these kids in the classroom.
